Obviously, there's a ton of new features, making Final Cut Pro X the new X-Mas Star. I still think there's a lot of room for improvement in many areas of the workflow, but for now I'm quite pleased. The one thing that I wish could've been improved more is the Smart Fix. I would've liked to have had a button that allowed me to quickly view the frequency of the color values that are out of the expected setting and not the color value itself (I know that's a bit of a silly request). I also had the same problem with Lr's White Balance tuning and wished it was a pre-correction feature. Another thing I missed was the ability to zoom out on a print only in Lightroom. I have a friend that loves to print to a resolution of around 12x18. It's great for framing together with some basic post-processing. I'd really love to have the ability to zoom into a print on the Lightroom desktop. Above all, save time in your entire digital workflow. For example, a single click can bring you from original capture, to finished looking product - in a single step. Not only is the overall user interface very accessible, the development team at Adobe has achieved a major milestone in that regard by providing new tools to help organize and manage your files efficiently. What's more, the new user interface will prevent you from losing data when you try to play tricks with the files. All this said, I believe that it's a very important point to consider: is a new user interface preventable? And is a faster workflow worth it at your level?
