I am having problems doing this. I tried using the onclick event (as described here) but that does not work because the document click handler is called before the component has had a chance to bind to it's view. I have also tried using the click event of a dynamically added click handler (as described here) but that does not work either, as ember cannot recognize the component if it has not been rendered yet (the dynamically added click handler is not removed after render). At the moment I am using the Component.bind method instead of the component.onclick method because I don't want to add additional click handlers to all the components. When do I have to do this? Where can I do this? Is there a better way to handle this? update sorry, but I cannot show you the full component, because the product I am trying to solve is proprietary and we can't tell you anything. I will try to give you an idea about what I need to do instead. I need to attach a click event to a component that is created in a render helper, and then, when a new click is generated, I want the DOM click handler to be removed from the previously created component. Do you have any idea how I can solve this? A: The general way to do this is to call Component.unmount() from your component. Ember.component('my-component', { //... unmount: function() { this.$().remove().find('*').remove(); }, //... }); Sunday, April 2, 2008 I'm on a roll today!
