I like the way that Lightroom 5 is designed for the average user. That's what Lightroom is, and that's what Photoshop is, too. We get many of our own downloads. I like that Lightroom 5 has a business-like, no-nonsense look and feel. Switch to Camera RAW and you don't have to wait for a raw file to open in Photoshop first. You can open an image straight from the Camera RAW dialog, save a file with that name (or choose any name), and open it in Photoshop. Like a versioned document, a versioned file saves automatically to the catalog, too. Camera RAW's conversion and editing capabilities are just as powerful as Lightroom or any other non-destructive editing program, and it's fully featured in both Basic and Expert modes. I recently wanted to use the watermarking capabilities in Photoshop. Watermarks are added to images at the time of creation. I wanted to change them from time to time. I wanted to add a background and change a few settings. In version CS3 and earlier, you couldn't use the Quick Selection tool to edit watermarks. You could only select the part of the image that the watermark was on, and try to select it out. In CS4, this limitation is gone. Digital cameras are the same cameras that used to have Kodaks on them, and they've always been ruled by the overhead light. We didn't have powerful, single-light strobes until the big lights started becoming available in the late 80s, but neither we nor the manufacturers followed Kodak's lead.
